Dear Senator Boschwitz:

I recently encountered the enclosed story regarding the CIA project to expand their headquarters and to acquire an art collection.

The Hadley Companies specialize in publishing and the sale of fine limited edition art prints with American nature and environmental scenes and western cultural history.

Our company has never attempted to do business with any aspect of the federal government and I am writing to ask your assistance in introducing our company's capabilities to the CIA in regard to this art project. Would you please supply me with the name of the correct person to contact at the GSA or CIA so that I may make a presentation regarding our products.

For your information, all our products are made in Minnesota to the highest quality standards. They are fine collectibles with a wildlife or western theme. You may be familiar with our retail branch, The Wooden Bird Galleries, in many malls in the Minneapolis area.

I am enclosing some introductory literature and information which I believe accurately reflects the capabilities of our company. I appreciate any assistance you can give me with this project.

Sincerely,

Bradford Shinkle IV

CIA

Ars Longa, Vita Brevis

The CIA is expanding its headquarters in Langley, Va., and, like many civic-minded builders, will dedicate one-half of 1% of its construction costs to works of art. Since ordinary taxpayers are not allowed into the intelligence agency's headquarters, none of them will ever see the CIA art. The amount of money involved is similarly secret, because that would reveal the extent of the construction plans. But the CIA wants to make sure that no bad choices are made. So it has asked the General Services Administration to select its art.

The ever careful GSA turned to the National Endowment for the Arts, and the NEA duly selected half a dozen candidates. As for what the CIA actually wanted of them, the agency proposed these specifications: "This art should reflect life in all its positive aspects (e.g., truth, justice, courage, liberty, etc.). It should engender feelings of well-being, hope, promise and such. It should not produce or reflect negative attitudes, political expressions, or feelings of futility. The art should respect sensitivities against sexual, sexist, race, ethnic or other related slurs . . . It should be forceful in style and manner; and be breathtaking in its beauty."

Could anyone in Moscow do better?

A Collection of Christmas Memories

Third Annual Christmas
Open Edition Print

"Together for the Season"

Terry Redlin

The joyful anticipation of rejoining family and friends for the holidays is captured in Terry Redlin's third annual Christmas print, "Together for the Season". It is an earlier time in rural America, when sleigh bells signaled the arrival of welcome guests, who brought with them the memories and traditions of other holidays celebrated together. This new release reiterates this master artist's appreciation for the holiday spirit as demonstrated in "The Sharing Season" and "Sharing Season II", which have continued to attract enthusiastic collector interest over the past two years.

"Together for the Season" contributes yet another perspective on sharing, reminding us that while time may pass and modes of transportation change, the singular warmth of being home for the holidays transcend the decades.
